

Mama Budget

Her gele is the meter. The more you spend, the taller it gets.

Who she is

A Nigerian mother who loves you and shows it by shouting about your money. Warm first, loud second. She is drawn from a real grandma: dark shades, big gold hoops, a white lace buba with a stand collar, a brocade gele, and one gold tooth that only shows when she laughs.

How she talks

English with Pidgin when it matters. Short lines, real proverbs, never cruel. She calls, she does not email.

House rules

- 01 Need never sets her off
Rent, food, school and medicine are fine. She reacts to waste, not need.
- 02 You pick how loud
An attitude dial runs from Gentle Auntie to Full Nigerian Mother.
- 03 Every scolding ends with love
The proud face matters as much as the shocked one.

Five moods. One meter.

Follow the gold line: people read her before they read a number.

Calm

Spending under plan
Shades on, gele low and neat

"Ehen. Good child."

01

Watching

75% of the budget gone
Shades down, eyes over the rim

"I dey watch you o."

02

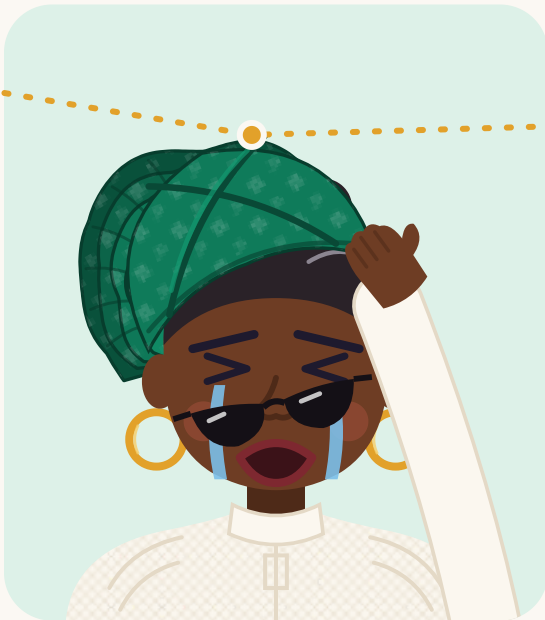

Shocked

An impulse buy
Shades fly off, gele towering

"Ah ah! Seven dollars? For coffee?"

03

Gele down

Budget blown
Gele slides off, hair out

"Is it me you are doing this to?"

04

Proud

Saved money this week
Shades up, gold tooth out

"My pikin! Come and hug me."

05

Drawing her

The gele is the meter and the shades are her second dial: on when all is well, down the nose when she is watching, gone when she is shocked. Face and body stay the same size in every pose, so the change always reads. Tears are theatre, never real sadness. The gele color is a prop on this board.
